Craig is a senior economist with twenty three years experience spanning both government and private sector projects, particularly in infrastructure, transport and tourism. Craig's expertise includes more than one hundred separate economic, financial or commercial appraisals, which have included cost benefit or cost effectiveness analyses.

He also has expertise in financial modelling using discounted cash flow techniques and commercial appraisal of project cash flows, as well as analysing a range of competition policy issues. Craig has worked across a number of approval and regulatory processes for infrastructure projects and government funding, including a range of business case frameworks.

Craig collaborates with individuals and teams in a wide range of organisations. He has worked for or alongside more than fifty different organisations including government agencies, statutory authorities, commercial businesses, education institutions, industry associations and not-for-profit organisations.

He currently leads a team of seven experienced economists engaged in economic modelling and policy appraisal in the Economic Policy Division of the Queensland Department of Employment, Economic Development and Innovation. Previously he held roles as a senior consultant in several professional service firms and as an economic analyst within the Queensland and Federal Governments.
